ONE IN 10 DELIVERY PARTNERS USE EVs

Fuel hikes expose slow EV transition in delivery fleets

ANEES HUSSAIN
Bengaluru, May 31

REPEATED FUEL PRICE hikes are putting pressure on delivery partners and exposing the limited progress online delivery platforms have made in shifting their fleets to electric vehicles, with most riders still dependent on petrol-powered two-wheelers.

Delivery partners, who bear their own fuel costs, have protested the increases and demanded a minimum payment of ₹20 per km. The latest hikes come at a time when gig worker unions say per-order earnings have fallen sharply, squeezing rider margins further.

The pressure comes despite major platforms including Eternal, Swiggy, Flipkart and Amazon committing to fully electric delivery fleets by 2030. Quarterly disclosures, however, suggest the transition remains at an early stage.

Eternal said in its Q4 FY26 results that active EV-based delivery partners rose to more than 100,000 in March 2026 from 52,000 a year earlier. But against a combined delivery partner base of more than 1 million across food delivery and quick commerce, EV penetration remains at roughly 10%.

Swiggy, which had 612,000 monthly transacting delivery partners in Q4 FY26, said earlier that its EV fleet had expanded seven-fold over 12 months, although it did not disclose the base number or current penetration levels.

The relatively low EV adoption means a large section of riders remains exposed to fuel-price increases.

Industry estimates suggest a delivery partner using a petrol-powered two-wheeler spends around ₹3.5-5 per km, factoring in the older and heavily used vehicles common in the gig workforce. In comparison, EV rental models offered by fleet operators are estimated to cost ₹2.5-2.75 per km, including battery swaps, maintenance and insurance.

"Demand for shared EVs can only accelerate in the current environment," said Amit Gupta, co-founder and CEO of Yulu, adding that it may take one to two months before any increase in EV adoption becomes visible.

Most delivery partners, however, work part-time and are unlikely to purchase EVs outright. Eternal's disclosures show delivery partners remain active on the platform for an average of 46 days a year. As a result, the transition is increasingly dependent on fleet-as-a-service operators such as Yulu and Zypp Electric that offer vehicles on rental models.

Gig worker unions say that lower payouts make even rented EVs difficult for many riders to afford.

They say per-order base pay has fallen from ₹34-42 in early 2024 to ₹ 5-10 now in many cases.

The shift to EVs has so far been more visible in quick commerce, where delivery distances are shorter and vehicle utilisation is higher.

Food delivery trips are typically longer and less predictable, making them less suited to current EV economics.

The recent fuel hikes may increase pressure on platforms to accelerate the transition. But for now, most delivery partners continue to remain exposed to rising fuel costs.

SLOW PROGRESS

- Delivery partners who bear own fuel costs have protested increase in fuel prives
- Delivery drivers have demanded a minimum payment of ₹20 per km
- Latest hikes come at time when gig worker unions say per order earnings have fallen sharply
- Pressure comes despite major platforms committing to fully electric delivery fleets by 2030
- Eternal said that active EV-based delivery partners rose to more than 100,000 in March 2026 from 52,000 a year earlier

VCs back brokers betting on investor guidance

AYANTI BERA
Bengaluru, May 29

THE BROKING MARKET is dominated by established players such as Zerodha, Groww, Upstox, Angel One and Motilal Oswal, but venture capital investors are backing a new generation of brokerages on the belief that the next phase of growth will be driven less by market access and more by helping investors decide what to buy and trade.

The thesis has attracted funding for startups such as Trackk, which has raised nearly $5 million since last year from investors including Lightspeed, and Sahi, which recently secured a $33-million Series B round led by investors including Elevation Capital and Accel.

The broking industry has undergone multiple shifts over the past decade. Zerodha popularised low-cost trading, while Groww expanded participation among first-time digital investors. Players such as Upstox, 5paisa and Dhan built scale by targeting specific customer segments, while traditional brokerages upgraded their digital offerings.

Investors now say that most platforms have solved the problem of opening accounts and executing trades, leaving a larger opportunity around investor discovery, education and decision-making.

"None of the firms are directly catering to the next 50 million investors who will join the markets over the coming decade," Romit Mehta, partner at Lightspeed, said. "They will need handholding, more education and, being used to global best, they will need a platform that feels like it is built for them versus feeling legacy."

Mumbai-based Trackk is targeting younger investors. Founded by 22-year-old Vedant Gupte, the platform says about 90% of its users are between 18 and 25 years old and it has registered nearly 200,000 sign-ups ahead of a wider rollout planned next week. Gupte said the industry's focus so far has largely been on making investing easier, while helping users identify investment opportunities remains a relatively underserved area. The company's "Opinions" feature links user responses to popular culture and current events with historical stock market performance to introduce investing concepts.

The focus on solving a specific user problem creates room for new entrants even in a crowded market, investors said. Mehta pointed to the success of Groww among first-time investors and Dhan among active traders as evidence that specialised products can still gain traction.

Elevation Capital sees a similar opportunity via AI. Vaas Bhaskar, partner at the firm, said incumbent brokerages have largely addressed market access but not the challenge of helping retail investors decide what to trade or invest in.

Sovereign cloud gains ground

URVI MALVANIA
Mumbai, May 31:

SOVEREIGN CLOUD IS emerging as one of India's key enterprise technology segments, as government policy, geopolitical uncertainty and rising concerns around data control push companies to rethink dependence on global hyperscalers.

The shift comes as India moves beyond a narrow focus on data localisation toward a broader framework centred on operational, jurisdictional and infrastructure sovereignty.

Recent guidance from the Ministry of Electronics and Information Technology (MeitY) formally recognised sovereign cloud providers as an eligible deployment option for sensitive government workloads, including Aadhaar, UPI, tax systems and land records. At the same time, a growing policy discourse around "India Cloud" and sovereign AI infrastructure is strengthening the case for domestically controlled cloud ecosystems, particularly for critical sectors such as telecom, defence, BFSI and public infrastructure.

The opportunity is also fuelling fresh investments in domestic digital infrastructure, including data centres, edge computing, fibre networks and AI compute capacity, as companies position themselves for the next phase of India's cloud market evolution. In a recent report, KPMG estimated the country's data-centre capacity buildout alone could generate more than $30 billion in capital expenditure by 2030, driven partly by localisation and sovereignty requirements.

"The $30 billion investment figure is not a projection. This buildout is being financed by long-term capital from institutional investors around the world. Sovereign wealth funds, PE firms look at Indian data centre market, not as some kind of speculative real estate play, but as a core utility," the consulting firm said in a blog-post.

The changing landscape is creating an opening for telecom operators, data-centre companies and state-backed infrastructure providers to position themselves as Indian-controlled alternatives to global cloud platforms. Bharti Airtel has emerged among the most vocal proponents of the opportunity. During its FY26 earnings call, the company said its "telco-grade sovereign cloud" business had secured 24 deals and was seeing increasing traction across industries.
